

WEEK 10 WAIVERS

LOOKING FOR PLAYERS ON LESS THAN 50% OF ROSTERS IN YAHOO

1

DONOVAN PEOPLES-JONES - WR (CLE)

He's been quietly a high-end WR3/flex option surpassing 70 receiving yards in four of the past five games, and has at least reached 50 yards in all but one game this season. He's a clear second on the team in targets and has yet to score a touchdown. While he may be due for positive regression, I wouldn't be relying on that and be happy with my four to five catches for 50-60 yards as a mid-tier, low-upside flex option in all scoring formats.

CHUBA HUBBARD - RB (CAR)

After a dominating Week 8, people assumed that D'onta Foreman would be the clear lead workhorse RB within the offense. When the CAR offense returned to earth last week, the possibility of a committee seemed more likely when Chuba Hubbard is healthy. Of course, this committee will be tough to predict and may be match-up based. Even with the receiving work, he will lack the volume to finish beyond a low-end flex option.

GREG DULCICH - TE (DEN)

Finishing within the top-12 TEs in three straight weeks in PPR scoring formats, he's been a consistent receiving threat to a struggling DEN offense. During those three games, he's also surpassed 50 yards in two games and is averaging more than five targets per game. At the same time, I wouldn't be starting him if I had someone like Hayden Hurst or Gerald Everett. However, if my only TE is on a bye week, he's a strong candidate to fill in.

WAN'DALE ROBINSON - WR (NYG)

While he hasn't taken over the WR1 role within the offense, he has flashed potential despite the rough performance against SEA. Coming off the bye week, he's an interesting bench stash as a WR5 to speculate if he can separate himself (15 targets in the last three games) from Darius Slayton (15 targets in the same three games) and Marcus Johnson (13 targets in the same three games). While the limited passing volume hurts his upside, the opportunity is there.
