

WEEK 7 WAIVERS

LOOKING FOR PLAYERS ON LESS THAN 50% OF ROSTERS IN YAHOO

1

ISAAC GUERENDO (RB) - SF (9)

This one is pretty simple. If Jordan Mason's injury forces him to miss another game, Guerendo automatically jumps into the RB3 category with some upside if he becomes the clear lead option. Patrick Taylor was involved for a handful of touches last week and will likely remain in a secondary role. Still, it's not enough for me not to consider taking a shot on a spot to start RB on a good offense. However, his limited window of opportunity makes him not worth spending much of your remaining budget.

RAY DAVIS (RB) - BUF (12)

He is another backup RB who looked impressive against a good defense, and with uncertainty about his window of opportunity due to James Cook's injury, he is only worth a little of your remaining budget. However, if you can get one or two games where he can be the lead rushing option with matchups against TEN and SEA, which doesn't strike much fear, I see him becoming a potential RB2 with perhaps some standalone value as a flex option when Cook initially returns?

DEMARIO DOUGLAS (WR) - NE (14)

While it's not league-winning numbers, he's been a solid WR3 in PPR scoring leagues with at least six catches and over 50 receiving yards with nine targets in three of his last four games. With Drake Maye looking more promising for the NE passing offense, perhaps there will be a receiving threat from the NE offense that will be fantasy-relevant in most leagues. I'm not spending a ton on rostering Douglas, but he's worth taking a speculative add if you need WR depth during the bye weeks.

JUJU SMITH-SCHUSTER (WR) - KC (6)

This is strange because I had already accepted that he was no longer the player we saw when he started his career in PIT. With Rashee Rice's injury, Smith-Schuster took advantage with his best game in a while, with over 125 receiving yards and second in targets last week. Of course, this may be the ceiling range of his outcomes, and he may come back down to earth, but the potential upside of adding the WR1 on a Mahomes-led offense is worth taking a stab at, even if it's only for a few games.
